Interference and signal detection in multimodal rivalry. Stimulus quality plays a key role in the outcome of multiple sensory competition. Typically, it has been assumed that the quality of a given stimulus dominates others when the stimuli are discriminable, but more typically, subjects perceive both stimuli at different levels of quality. Using simultaneous binary-choice reaction time and signal detection procedures, we measured the impact of the quality of the two stimuli on the bias of reaction times (RTs) and accuracy. The bias of RTs, but not accuracy, was sensitive to the quality of the stimulus; specifically, high quality stimuli bias RTs towards the left (right hemisphere leads) and low quality stimuli toward the right (left hemisphere leads). We also found evidence of suppression: with one of the two stimuli suppressed, the accuracy of the remaining stimulus was lower than that with no suppression (stimuli-dependent suppression). The relative biases and suppressive effects of the two stimuli had distinct neural correlates: signals from a non-dominant hemisphere were suppressed more than signals from a dominant hemisphere, whereas the biases had a more widely distributed neural correlates with effects on both hemispheres. These results suggest a highly complex role for stimulus quality in perceptual competition, with the influence of high quality stimuli being overridden by low quality stimuli and with the specific quality of a stimulus determining the degree to which it suppresses other stimuli, with the suppression arising from a distributed network of bilateral cortical regions.

as the court judges in the higher and more abstract spheres; but there is a certain kind of _frocks_ in their whole being as there is in their whole being in that of the hens and chickens, the pigs and dogs, and so on. The expanding kernel absorbs the combustible milk which sours into acid. The growth of the figure, in the same way, absorbs the fixed lines and colour of the human character which must decay into the air and the grave. The young life grows, against all evil possibilities, upon the prospect of the grave and the dust. The flower, the blade, the leaf—what are these, but the ripening of the seed or germ? The sow—and we cannot doubt it—is the best emblem of the race. We have said that the two species of vulgarism, which come from the tyros and from the academics, are native to the mass of humanity, the academics and the tyros. If we say that the tyros are common, we may mean either that they are in the majority or that they are of more power in the world than any others. It is, perhaps, just as well to treat these vulgarisms separately. The first, the most offensive and most widespread, is the tyros ex professo. The strength of this lies mainly in the fact that they profess their vulgarism. They show their wickedness in open daylight, and are very apt to be much more repulsive to the eye, the sense of smell, and the sense of taste than the other breed of graceless people are to the sense of hearing and the sense of sight. In the vulgarity of the tyros, the senses of smell and taste are in the ascendant, as is to be expected. They advertise the passions and vices—boorishness, coarseness, vulgarity—of their minds as they might advertise the sexual qualities of their bodies. It is not that they are worse than the others, or even that they are more able than the others; but they are more conspicuous and, for that very reason, more annoying. They are bad souls worse bodies. They are called “hicks” and “red-necks” and the like, and they know it, and, being ashamed of
