Many enterprises and other organizations continue to use paper documents and other media for transacting business. However, in the face of technological and other developments, paper documents and other media may not have a place in the future. For example, electronic communications and the Internet may be utilized in a variety of ways by enterprises and organizations for transacting business. Such electronic communications and the Internet may be used for, for example, exchanging information between employees, obtaining and providing information to and from clients, providing access to data and services, and other purposes. In some situations, electronic communications may be faster and more efficient than paper-based communications. In other situations, electronic communications may be of uncertain quality and security and may not be well-integrated into the workflow of an enterprise or other organization. Depending on the size of an organization, an enterprise may have a number of electronic communications programs, with each program having its own rules and procedures for transacting business. Consequently, there may be a need to integrate the rules and procedures of various electronic communications programs into a single integrated communications system. C_Pack_E_Shield Simple_E
