

“The technologies we introduced in FIFA 20 remain at the heart of FIFA 22,” said Matt Bilbey, Head of Development at EA SPORTS. “We’ve made real, actual improvements to your gameplay.” The most notable technical innovation in FIFA 22 is “HyperMotion Technology.” Using Motion Capture technologies developed by Mathias Müller and Maxpil, The Power of 22 hosts a real-life football match in an NFL stadium where 22 real-life players are involved in a FIFA match. The motion capture data collected from the real-life players are used to power “HyperMotion Technology,” in FIFA 22, allowing your player the ability to naturally recreate the fluidity and other movements of your player. In addition to learning to create players with advanced football abilities such as advanced dribbling and cross-body passes, players can also create their own unique build through the Create a Player progression tree, allowing them to build their own personal style. With refined defensive gameplay, players will now be able to defend more effectively by leaning on their opposition, causing missed shots and giving them the opportunity to successfully block shots. Players’ interceptions and passes are now more realistic, allowing them to more often than not retain the ball for long periods of time. Players can more easily retain possession of the ball by making shorter passes and initiating moves with higher intensity. Finally, defenders can make more accurate and dynamic tackles. Players can learn how to master the unique skills and abilities of their teammates, such as an ability to dribble past all of a player’s defenders while creating a false pass to another teammate. Players can also perform new variations of individual tricks, such as fake and cross-body crosses. Along with new animations, players have also been given a variety of new physical behaviors, such as wall-jumping and long ball acrobatics. “In FIFA we trust fans to tell us what they want to see in the game,” added Bilbey. “We put in the work, and in FIFA 22 we trust that you will enjoy your time with the game.” Key Features include: The return of Player Impact Engine (PIE) – The physics engine in FIFA has been completely revamped. FIFA 22’s physics engine allows players to feel more fluid on the pitch, which means defenders now fall down more naturally when being tackled. Players’ movements
