But there are major deficiencies when these kits are used to detect HBsAg and anti-HBs simultaneously. One such deficiency is that the HBsAg kits currently in use are not designed to accurately detect the specific antigen by measuring optical absorbance or fluorescence. This is mainly due to the fact that these kits are not highly sensitive or quantifiable. Therefore, these kits cannot detect the low amounts of HBsAg that could result from low-level carrier state and acute hepatitis B. In addition, these kits cannot distinguish between antibodies to the HBsAg and those to the e antigen. Thus, there is a continuing need for additional assays for detecting hepatitis B surface antigen. The
