France appoints new defence minister François Lefebvre France's Socialist government has announced the new Defence Minister, Ségolène Royal, the former president's daughter and a former soldier, but François Lefebvre, a Defence Minister for over four years, is stepping down. Francois Lefebvre (Arnaud Le Houerou/AFP) The presidency of Nicolas Sarkozy named Defence Minister François Lefebvre, a Socialist cabinet minister for four years, on Wednesday. Francois Hollande's Socialist government has announced the new Defence Minister, Ségolène Royal, the former president's daughter and a former soldier, but François Lefebvre, a Defence Minister for over four years, is stepping down. Francois Hollande's Socialist government has announced the new Defence Minister, Ségolène Royal, the former president's daughter and a former soldier, but François Lefebvre, a Defence Minister for over four years, is stepping down. In line with European coalition reforms, which reduce the cabinet's size, foreign minister Bernard Kouchner and defence minister Arnaud Montebourg are staying on. Lefebvre, 57, will be replaced by Ségolène Royal, 50, the daughter of Francois Mitterrand, the former president. The former air force lieutenant-colonel, a member of the Socialist Party, previously oversaw the military's transformation into a fighting force. Royal is a career defence minister, having been first named defence secretary in 2009 and promoted to minister last year. She is also deputy chairwoman of the Socialist Party, a role which has her at the centre of political turbulence within the party. Lefebvre is out of the spotlight and goes back to the role he held before being named minister in 2009: ministry of Defence representation in the east of the country. It is however a move seen as
