1. Field of the Invention This invention relates to a bus system within an integrated circuit of information handling systems. More particularly, this invention relates to two or more bus systems within an integrated circuit that enables data to be transferred to or from a data bus through both the primary and secondary bus interface. 2. Description of the Related Art The evolution of technology has resulted in a proliferation of integrated circuits ("IC's") typically utilizing a multiple input, multiple output ("MIMO") arrangement. In such a system, a bus tree structure provides interconnection between internal address and data bus systems and outer devices. Such structures are commonly referred to as "MIMO bridges", "MIMO busses" or "MIMO trees". Busses provide a signal path for the exchange of information. The design of the bus and bus protocols must meet certain requirements to operate efficiently. For example, a number of requirements must be met to avoid sluggish operating speeds. Various factors contribute to sluggish operating speeds. One factor is impedance. If too much impedance in the bus structure results in long signal lengths and capacitances to the power supplies, there is a delay or impedance to the signals that impacts the operating speed of the system. Another factor is the varying nature of the external devices. During low loads, i.e., when the MIMO tree operates at only a few devices, a constant impedance path could be maintained. However, in higher loads, i.e., when the MIMO tree connects to, for example, a graphics adapter card (along with many peripheral cards), the constant impedance may prove to be inadequate during high loads. Also, a stable high load impedance is important to avoid possible physical damage to the devices and disruption of the functioning of the system. The continual increase of demand for functionality of processing systems results
