A leak of new information about a potential Falcon Heavy launch for Christmas has surfaced via a glowing post on NewSpaceToday. The Falcon Heavy launch will be performed by the SpaceX fleet, named "Falcon Heavy 2.0". The new rocket will boast a larger core with 3, but will be able to carry up to 24 metric tons into orbit. The rocket will have six Payloads, and it will include three "standard" Falcon 9 engines, plus additional thrusters on each side. "This is the upper stage for the Falcon Heavy, too," Musk wrote on Twitter, before adding that "The lower stage, including Merlin 1D engines, is reused." The vehicle will carry a Tesla Roadster, Starman, Cybertruck and a "secret payload." The publication notes that the new rocket should be more powerful than the Falcon 9 v1.1. They wrote: In addition to the actual massiveness of the second core and upper stage, we're told this rocket will be substantially more powerful than the first generation Falcon 9, which at most could see a topspin of 6,900kg to low 7,000kg. This is certainly something of a pre-launch release for a launch that has been postponed twice since Christmas. The original date for the launch was December 20th, but then it was postponed to January 6th, then to February 6th and now to March 6th. To see more pictures and everything pertaining to this launch, visit NewSpaceToday. The launch will also come after a number of successes in 2019 for the SpaceX fleet, including the Starlink Satellite (January) and the Crew Dragon launch (March). The Falcon Heavy has not flown since January 2019, when it was launched from Kennedy Space Center. For those of you interested in the full document, it can be downloaded here.
