.Q: Javascript math comparison error? I'm using an API to pull a bunch of stock information, my server pulls some information and returns an object which contains a value of the key 'Close'. (Yes, I am able to pull some data successfully through the API.) When I try to compare this value against a double using the below code, I get a console error message of "NaN". The value of the object is currently: Close: 738.33 Code below:

```
var test = "Close: " + val; console.log(Number(test)); if (Number(test) === Number("738.33")) { console.log("Correct."); } else { console.log("Wrong."); }

 A: When I try to compare this value against a double using the below code, I get a console error message of "NaN". Yes, because you are trying to compare a string containing the value of an object against a number. The correct way to check the value of an object is:

if (Object.keys(val).includes("Close")) { console.log("Correct."); } else { console.log("Wrong."); }

 But using a lot of if statements to compare strings is usually a bad way of doing things.

Introduction The Dukat Season 2.0 promo was successful and many people were clamoring for another event to answer all of their questions about Cryptic's upcoming Season. So here is the Dukat Season 2.1 Promo! Keep in mind that the link above goes to the Cryptic forums and to do the promotion you need to be an official Cryptic. How to participate The first steps are to be in the Cryptic forums and ask the administrators to make a group for the event and for the promotion to appear on the homepage. In the sub forum named "Season 2.0" the team made a post announcing the promotion. However, the maximum number of participants reached had not yet been reached so this post is not yet promoted. All we need is one other team member to help us get the daily limit of 850 players.
