A: filetype:zip does the trick. The type 1 diabetes mellitus (T1DM) patient population is rapidly increasing due to an aging population and the lack of an effective and accepted T1DM prevention strategy. Because the disease is relatively infrequent, there is no national registry. There are no national guidelines for treatment and these vary regionally, making prescription decisions by primary care physicians difficult and controversial. T1DM patients are generally overweight, and are often not advised to exercise. Diabetes has been shown to alter risk of some cancers, and there is a suggestion that diagnosis of T1DM before the age of 25 increases that risk. There is also a wealth of data on the important adverse effects of T1DM medications on renal function and bone metabolism. T1DM is associated with a significant financial burden due to treatment of long-term complications. In addition, T1DM can be emotionally devastating to patients and their families. In the US, the burden of the disease is substantial, particularly in the children. There are no approved comprehensive prevention strategies. The goals of this project are to estimate the incidence, prevalence, and risks of kidney and bone damage in pediatric and adult T1DM patients, and to determine the value of different treatment options and quality of life. This project is a collaborative, three-year study involving 6 clinical centers (Children's Hospital and Regional Medical Center and The Ohio State University, all in Columbus, Ohio) in eastern, midwestern, and southwestern portions of the United States. A total of 1000 T1DM patients are being enrolled. Central coordination of the study, assessment, and follow-up are provided by the Project Office (Children's Hospital and Regional Medical Center, Columbus, Ohio).I know that this is a debateable fact, but...
