Protesters have blocked a London tube railway line to protest at the "unfair and unlawful" decision to slash ticket prices at Heathrow airport. Anti-HRA campaigners carrying placards and chanting slogans including "no to the airport" were joined by train travellers from around the capital in last night's protest on the Victoria line. Photo: John Stillwell/PA Wire Protesters and their supporters, including the owner of a wedding dress store in Acton who was rescued from closure by airport compensation. chanted "never again" as they sat on the railway tracks. They also marched on Heathrow Terminal 5, which was targeted earlier this month after protesters occupied it for two days. The Independent on Sunday understands that nine passengers were also lifted off a train at Heathrow Central station, which is next to the Terminal 5 car park, for health reasons. Campaigners want the government to scrap the 50% cut in the cost of journeys on the tube and to halt all expansion of Heathrow. John Philpott, 21, who travelled to the protest from Camberwell, told the Independent: "The cost of travel into London for people who work is astronomical, so it's really important for us to do our bit to highlight this." Photo: Ciaran Murray But the protesters' right to sit on the tracks on the Tube, which is open to the general public, was questioned by some, including former London Assembly member Jake Berry. The leader of the Independent Group for electoral reform, Chris Leslie, said: "I'm struggling with how that is OK, why a group of people have to block a line of a Tube. It's not right that everybody has to put up with people shouting and chanting, you're being railroaded into something in the name of freedom of speech." Protesters said they would remain on the track for up to 16 hours and the Victoria line said it was c6a93da74d
