A message will be displayed in the dialog box telling you to restart the computer for the changes to take effect. A search will be done for Bluetooth enabled devices and the BT510 will be listed along with a password to use for security. The BT510 will appear as Bluetooth only in Windows 98SE; the rest are treated as standard input devices.If you require any assistance, you can use the BlueSoleil driver configuration utility included with the BT510 to configure the BT510 for your particular connection. If you would prefer not to use BlueSoleil, you can also use the included no-cost no-name software, called BTsight. BTsight was designed to make it easy to make any Bluetooth enabled peripherals work with any Bluetooth enabled computer as BTsight will automatically configure the BT510 as you need it. BTsight and BlueSoleil share the same set of drivers, and you can switch between the two utilities as desired. They are compatible with each other; you can switch between them with the simple click of a mouse button. To view the driver update software (called the "bludata.inf") that is currently installed on your computer, go to Start | Programs | Solvusoft.] (its currently located under http://www.solvusoft.com/en/) and double-click the bludata.inf file. The software will then show you which version of the driver is currently installed on your computer, and the version number to match the existing version for your device.
