Terrestrial rhinoceros beetle (Coleoptera: Scarabaeidae) examination of global climate change and local climate change effects on susceptibility to variable temperatures.

Understanding how climate affects pests is critical to climate change preparedness because the geographic distribution of pests will change as climates shift. To better understand the vulnerability of a specific pest to climate change, we investigated how combinations of warm and cool temperatures affect populations of the terrestrial rhinoceros beetle (Coleoptera: Scarabaeidae). In a field greenhouse study, beetles were exposed to constant warm (32 degrees C, 25-hour daily photoperiod) and cool (18 degrees C, 10-hour daily photoperiod) temperatures for 4 months. Beetles exposed to constant cool temperatures had higher mortality compared with beetles exposed to constant warm temperatures, with a 50% mortality at 34.3 degrees C. Beetles from 25 to 32 degrees C had 100% adult emergence, suggesting that mortality was due to suboptimal development. Beetles exposed to constant warm temperatures had similar phenology as beetles exposed to constant cool temperatures, and constant cool temperatures resulted in significantly fewer individuals of smaller size and weight. In a second experiment conducted in the field, beetles exposed to natural daily temperatures had, on average, a 0.4 degree C increase in daily maximum temperature from 22 to 24 degrees C. This increase in temperature increased mortality rates of beetles from 32 to 38 degrees C by 16%, suggesting that these beetles are somewhat less tolerant to increased temperatures. This result is consistent with a previous field study examining the response of this species to increased temperatures in Central North Carolina that showed that beetles from 32 to 38 degrees C were able to survive at 30 degrees C, but this field study also found that beetles died more often when exposed to higher temperatures (27 and 28 degrees C). In summary, beetle populations showed decreased tolerance to increased temperatures, but this tolerance decreased as temperatures increased, suggesting that beetles may have decreased resistance to the effects of climate change as temperatures increase in magnitude.
