some objections are to be noted for proper understanding of these aspects. first, although there is no longer a need to be a member of the legislature to become the president, this rule does not apply to the vice president. however, one is still required to have been a member of the legislature when the electors gave their votes to the presidential candidate. neither the ministers nor the president, may not be a member of the legislature of the state, even when he is a member of the executive. if a person is not a member of the legislature, he is not eligible for the office of president of india. the term of the president shall be six years and one half from the date of his assuming office. he shall be eligible to contest in a direct and general election from any part of the state within india. the question has been raised that the president is also to be a representative of the people. the constitution envisages the legislature to be the centralising force in the country. a legislative council or parliament is composed of elected representatives from the lower house and the upper house. while the lower house is the elected or the representative body of the people, the upper house is the representative body of the smaller states. each house has three components. firstly, the house of people is the highest legislative body. it consists of 2/3 members from elected state legislators and 1/3 members from the president of india. since the number of the upper house is based on population, the ratio of representatives in the upper house is high than that of the lower house. this has constitutional importance. secondly, the state legislative council is the second highest in the hierarchy. it consists of elected members of the state legislative assembly, members from tribal communities, and members nominated by the states, representing various interests. the final component of the legislature is the council of states which is the lower house of the parliament. this consists of members from the bicameral state legislative assemblies appointed by the president of india.

the growing complexity of governmental activities arising from expanding state involvement in social and economic spheres and the increasing diversity of parliamentary functions have rendered legislative supervision of the administration more and more difficult. the existing legislative committee system has become inadequate in ensuring administrative accountability to parliament. this paper examines the post second world war phenomenon of establishing departmentally related specialised subject committees to meet the new demands. he proposed that instead of talking about the 'ideal india' and making it an ideal for the ideology of the ruling party, india should be transformed into 'indian ideal', and the ideal of the indian constitution should be to convert india into a modern, scientific state. he urged that the hindus were becoming unintelligent, illiterate, and unpatriotic, and many of them were also anti-national. he also pointed out the danger of fundamentalism. but congress-ruled state governments opposed the book, and it was banned in punjab. effectively, these may be to provide for such matters as general welfare of children; welfare of parents; education; safe environment; poverty alleviation; and adequate supply of drinking water, housing, electricity, means of communication, and transportation, and the need to ensure adequate physical, intellectual, and moral environment of children. 3. our parliament by subhash kashyap pdf free download like any other constitutional forum, judicial power emanates from the constitution itself, and, by its own provisions, is not subject to any legislative or executive reservation.'
