It is always recommended that you have one in place when releasing your software to end users. For those that don't know, readme files are optional, and can be ignored, but are still included in most software to remind users that they need to read the readme file, or alternatively, read the contents of the software when it is installed. Allows creating and editing text files and other documents Spell Check Text To Speech Translate Add objects, images, videos, shapes, tables, dates, symbols and links, as well as other text files Creating a file with multiple pages is one of the most common tasks that users do. Usually, they create folders with separate folders inside them, and add files to each of the folders. For example, a user may have created a folder with the name "Motors" and added two files to it: "Detroit.RTF" and "Detroit.DOCX". Unfortunately, such a way of organizing documents is not practical, because folders are most often located in directories that are also on the computer's desktop. That means that users must be permanently in the directory, where the documents are stored. On top of that, this method may become unfeasible when the number of documents in the folder increases. If you want to organize your documents in such a way that you are able to see all the files at any moment, you need to find a better solution. In this case, you can choose between two options. The first one is to keep everything on the desktop and just create a folder in there, where you can add your files. However, you may want to move the documents to the computer's desktop and to be able to change their location. This can be achieved with Windows Explorer. Before you do this, you need to disable the desktop to make sure that it will not affect your files. You will have to follow these steps to do that: Open Windows Explorer Select the folder containing the files you want to organize and click on it Select Edit -> Advanced -> Folder Options In the Folder Options window that opens up, click on the Folder Location tab Locate "Browse for Folder" Move the cursor over it and press Enter Click on OK Now, open Windows Explorer Click on the desktop to open it Right-click on the desktop and select "New Folder" In the New Folder dialog window, enter the name of the folder that you want to create, and press OK Now, go to the folder in which you have placed your documents, open the Desktop Properties dialog, and click on the "Location" tab Locate "Change 2edc1e01e8
