type central serous choroidopathy: the basic knowledge It has been quite a time, by the way, since the optical media, also known as CD or CD-ROM, was invented in the early 1980s. In this article, I want to discuss the case of an eye that is looking at darkness. I want to talk about the changes, between the diagnosis and the explanation of what has happened. Diagnosis. A 45-year-old man has been sent to our outpatient clinic by his optometrist. In the office there was a patient with a history of sudden blindness in his right eye, that made him travel to the hospital. On the examination, we found a patient with no signal of myopia, who had type 1 diabetes and hypertension. We also noted the presence of a few intraocular inflammatory lesions, with no causal relationship with the diabetics. The patient had a visual acuity of 6/6, and a normal funduscopy, the right eye. The fundus examination performed after that, showed a white lesion of 5 mm in diameter, in the temporal sector of the right macula (Figs. 1a and 1b). Please direct any questions or comments to: erythros@med.uoa.gr What is the type of central serous choroidopathy that is being examined in this case? It is not a rare condition. It is a disease of the pigmented epithelial cells of the choroid. The explanation is very clear in this case, and only requires looking at the pathogenesis of this disease. What is the pathogenesis of this disease? Let's say that the macula of the right eye is being analyzed. The posterior part of the iris is placed near the crystalline lens, and the pathogenesis of the disease starts by an impairment of the function of the pigment epithelium. The pigment epithelium has a dual role: on the one hand, it is responsible for the absorption of the light by the absorption of the blue light, and the release of antioxidants by its transport to the retinal pigment epithelium. On the other hand, it is responsible for the production of epiretinal membranes. Its release of cytokines and growth factors contributes to the activation of the fibroblasts and the production of collagen and fibrin,
