Trying to figure out what to say... Trying to figure out what's going on! We don't always realize how much our mental state effect our physical state. That, combined with the other information we are fed on a daily basis, can cause moments of panic, anxiety, frustration, anger, hurt, confusion, etc. Most of us are self-aware enough to recognize those feelings and we understand that they are a combination of thoughts about the circumstances around us and our perceived position in it. And with everything else we experience on a daily basis, the fact that we are 'just feeling a little anxious' can seem like not enough of a reason to freak out. But I'm going to suggest that if the next time you feel a bit of discomfort, you consider that feeling as an "anxiety symptom", it may have a bigger impact than you might be thinking. When we're experiencing a particularly strong emotion, it's not uncommon to feel like it's taking over our entire mental state. We can, and do, lose objectivity about certain things we perceive in the world. But that emotion also works its way into our awareness and makes it hard to realize that we're not actually facing the reality that we are feeling. It could be we're feeling that because we've been conditioned to expect feeling that way. It could be we're having a moment of anxiety because we're trying to avoid feeling that way. It could be a real piece of information we're processing. But what it is we are really feeling is going to depend on us, but just because a feeling takes over our mind, it doesn'
